EAT WELL IN GERMANY

Four Regular Meals, With Between-Time Snacks, Enable the Well-to-Do Berliner to Keep Strength For His Work.

The Englishman has no great variety of things to eat, but he is always eating them, and when he is not eating them he is swigging tea. Yet in these regards the German excels him. The Englishman takes a nap at breakfast, but after that first hour the German leaves him, hopelessly distanced, far in the rear, writes Levin S. Cobb, in the Saturday Evening Post. It is due to his habits in this respect that the average Berliner has a double chin running all the way around, and four rolls of fat on the back of his neck, all closely clipped and shaved, so as to bring out their full beauty and symmetry, and he has a figure that makes him look as though an earthquake had shaken loose everything on the top floor and it had all fallen through into his dining room.

Your true Berliner eats his regular daily meals—four in number—and all large ones, and in between times he now and then gathers a bite. For instance, about ten o'clock in the morning he knocks off for an hour and has a few cups of hard-boiled coffee and some sweet, sticky pastry with whipped cream on it.

Then about four o'clock in the afternoon he browses a bit, just to keep up his appetite for dinner. This, though, is but a snack—say, a school of Usmarch herring and a krant pot, some more coffee and more cake, and one thing and another—merely a preliminary to the real food, which will be coming along a little later on.

Between acts at the theater he excuses himself and goes out and prepares his stomach for supper, which will follow at 11 o'clock, by drinking two or three steins of thick Munich beer, and nibbling on such small tidbits as a few links of German sausage or the upper half of a raw Westphalia ham.

There are 17 distinct and separate varieties of German sausage and three of them are edible, but the Westphalia ham, in my judgment, is greatly over-rated. It is pronounced Westphalia with the accent on the last part, where it belongs.

In Germany, however, there is a pleasant agreeably smothered in young cabbage which is delicious and in season plentiful. The only drawback to complete enjoyment of this dish is that the grasping and avaricious German restaurant keeper has the unfounded nerve to charge you, in our money, 10 cents for a whole pleasant and half a peck of cabbage—say enough to furnish a full meal for two tolerably hungry adults and a child.

Something Added.

There were half a dozen sitters in the barroom of a tavern at Point Jefferson, G. L., when Isaac Denton dropped in in search of a man to work for him. He had a big comforter around his neck, and was rubbing his hands, and was asked:

"Do you call this party cold deacon?"

"Fourteen below," he replied.

"Oh, no, it can't be that."

"I looked at the thermometer as I left home."

"But it isn't even freezing."

"Fourteen below!"

There was a long minute of silence, with all the men winking at each other, and at last the deacon felt a twinge of conscience and observed:

"But I wish to add that I had drunk three glasses of hard cider with my supper, and that thermometer hasn't been very reliable since it got run over by a load of hay last summer. Maybe the right degree is 14 above. I am on my way to prayer meeting, and I may get some sort of guidance there. If the spirit moves me then she's above, if the spirit don't then she's 14 below and still a-frozing."
